

Think Pink All Over

Lids, lips and cheeks have synced up, and backstage makeup artists have chosen striking pink for the monochromatic palette. The blushing hue can be a tough one to pull off; Glazer notes that skin must be flawless (or flawlessly covered) "so no natural redness comes through," as that throws off the look. Adds Geason, "You should bear in mind whether your client uses foundation and whether she has pink undertones in her complexion, because if she does, rosy shadow will only highlight the pink in her skin."

Eyes awash in pink also need a bit of finessing. "If your client has redness in the waterlines of her eyes, she'll have difficulty with this trend," says Swaab. To counteract this, she recommends using an eyeliner pencil in matte white, beige or pearl to conceal any redness. If in doubt, Billera suggests keeping vibrancy to a minimum and scaling back on the trend's matchy-matchy ideal by "choosing one standout feature that will pop and keeping all other areas of the face soft and subtle, yet like-toned."
